

CONTRIBUTORS

DANIELLA CONLEY is a fourth-year student at Dalhousie University. She will be graduating this spring from the Bachelor of Arts program with a Combined Honours in English and Creative Writing and a minor in Spanish. Daniella has been practicing her craft as a writer for many years and would like to continue her involvement in the literary world through publishing in the future.

ALLISON HILL is a fourth-year student who will soon have an Honours English degree with a minor in Spanish. After graduating in May, she'll be returning home to the San Francisco Bay Area to thaw, spend time with her dogs, and hopefully do some writing and editing. Allison is also considering pursuing a Masters after some time off in order to study what she has come to realize is her interest within English - gay and lesbian subtext in Victorian literature.

ELLEN JAMIESON is from Peterborough, Ontario and is completing her Combined Honours in Biology and English at Dalhousie this year. Her thesis investigated the effects of anthropogenic noise on parent-offspring communication in Tree Swallows. In September, Ellen will be attending Trent University to pursue a Masters in Environmental and Life Sciences with a focus on avian conservation. She loves birding, biking, and books, and hopes to continue finding the beauty in both science and the arts.

Contributors

ERIK NOLAN is an English Honours student in his fifth year of undergraduate studies. He writes largely on race, gender, and politics, and favors studying medieval and modernist literature. Beyond the hallowed halls of academia, he is an amateur dancer, an aspiring fisherman, an avid volunteer, and an ardent violinist. He enjoys reading speculative fiction for pleasure and the news for torment, balancing his mental health precariously between the two.

HELEN PINSENT is in her graduating year at Dalhousie, and should really be writing a paper right now. Instead, she's likely reading, watching, or listening to something lovely and underappreciated. She'll be returning to Dal in the fall for her Master's, where she hopes combine her love of Terry Pratchett with her love of validation through praise.

CHRIS WIECZOREK is a second year student from Victoria, British Columbia, currently pursuing a double major in English and Political Science. When not trying to figure out ways to pretend like he's done all of the readings for seminar classes, he enjoys getting outdoors, playing soccer and hockey, and reading books not assigned for class.

SAM KRUEGER is a combined Honours English and Early Modern Studies student at King's and Dalhousie Universities. He enjoys reading and writing poetry and fiction, good coffee, and small, shiny things.

Contributors

ELIZABETH MCELROY is a third year student at the University of King's College. Her interests include contemporary literature, creative writing, and watching 'Cosmos'. She loves writing novel-length fiction and is inspired by the writers Neil Gaiman and Lewis Carroll. She enjoys being surrounded by books and intends to continue her studies in the field of Library and Information Management.

EMMA PETERS is originally from small town Ontario. She is an undergraduate student in her fourth year of Biochemistry and English. She has plans to become a pharmacist. English became a love of hers in first year, with the help of an amazing professor, and has led her to many great works and great friends.